There is a case to be made for Japanese equities as yen rallies

◆ Ultralow interest rates in the US could drive some investments into other jurisdictions.

◆ The Nikkei 225 is attempting to test a long-term resistance and a breakout could lead to further gains.

◆ The yen is at one of its strongest levels in five years and a reversal could help Japanese equities.

◆ The currency and Japanese stocks tend to have an inverse correlation.

◆ The FAB AAC has reduced some of its cash allocation to increase the allocation to Japanese equities.

Japanese stocks are often overlooked given the stasis which has characterized the country's economy for the past 30 years. However, quietly, this year Japanese stocks have shown unusual strength. Since July, a traditional correlation between the Nikkei 225 stock index and the Japanese yen has been mostly broken.

Normally, when the yen strengthens, the Nikkei 225 tends to drop. For the past few months, the index has been mostly rising even as the yen has strengthened. The yen rose 0.79% today and the Nikkei rallied 1.73%. The Nikkei 225 is now testing a long-term resistance it has failed to breach several times recently.

The Nikkei 225 closed today at 24105.28, its highest in two years. At this level, it has breached 24,083, which it touched and retreated from three times in the past year. If the index surpasses 24,270, a level recorded in October 2018 and the highest since 1991, it could move even higher.

Japan is also recovering well from the Covid-19 crisis. The country implemented a value added tax last year which has mostly been absorbed by the economy. High-frequency data, such as public transport usage and foot traffic in malls is nearly back to pre-Covid levels, suggesting the country's economy could continue to strengthen.

Car sales offered a similarly bullish economic picture, having increased 29% in October compared to a year ago. Granted, a year ago the sales numbers were unusually low because of the implementation of the new sales tax. Still, these data points are positive.

The downside is that the number of virus cases and deaths has increased in the past few weeks. This is to be expected, given the advance of winter in the Northern Hemisphere is forecast to accelerate the spread of the virus. However, daily deaths remain a quarter of what they were in April.

The Nikkei 225 was testing a resistance and a breach could foreshadow further gains

Property prices have also moved steadily up, gaining nearly 13% since they bottomed in 2012. While the number is not large, it reverses many years of losses. This increase helps the value of collateral for banks and allows them to increase lending. High-frequency data in the country has also indicated more willingness to borrow from the Japanese, an important change for the country.

These reasons drove the FAB Asset Allocation Committee (FAB AAC) to move their position in Japanese equities to slightly overweight, even though the general equities position of the AAC remains underweight in stocks. The allocation to Japanese equities came from reducing the cash position of the model portfolio of the AAC.
