The spectre of Brexit returns, as Europe continues to suffer

◆ Prime Minister Boris Johnson suggests he is willing to complete the separation from the European Union without a trade deal.

◆ The Conservative Government is submitting legislation to dilute the legal force of the withdrawal agreement.

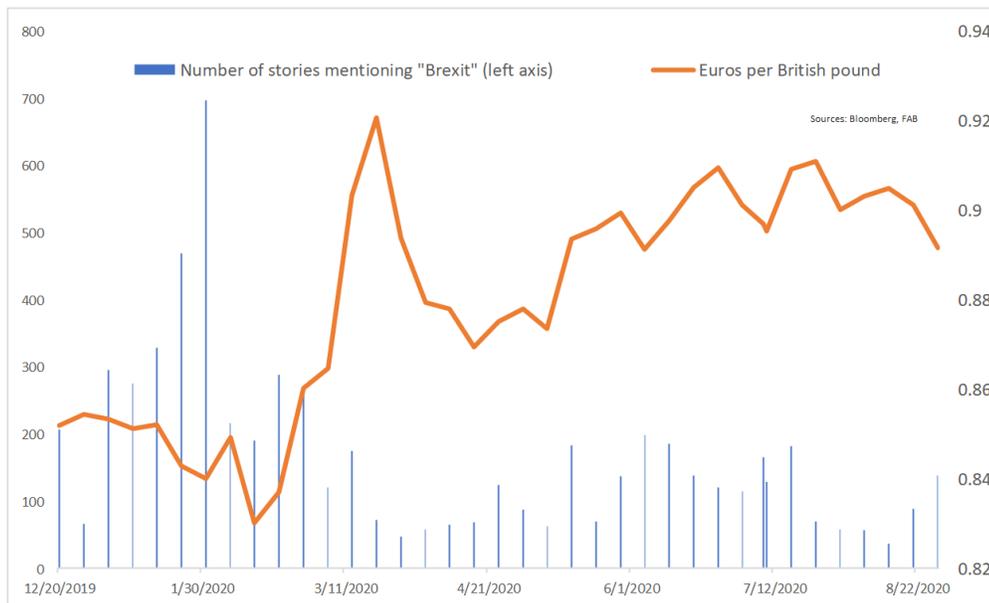

◆ EU officials could react strongly as the UK unilaterally changes the terms agreed last year.

◆ The move comes months ahead of a deadline for a final withdrawal framework to be signed in order to avoid a no-deal separation.

◆ The FAB AAC remains underweight equities while favouring gold and investment-grade debt.

Brexit is back. With a bit more than three months left before the UK is set to complete its withdrawal from the European Union, Prime Minister Boris Johnson is expected to announce that his government will introduce laws that will unilaterally change terms of a transitional agreement between the country and the bloc reached late last year. He has also indicated he would be comfortable completing the separation process without a trade deal with the UK's biggest commercial partner.

Despite the wide-ranging implications of the headlines, the British pound was only marginally weaker against the US dollar and the stock markets in both the UK and Europe were up significantly. The biggest victim of the headlines was the pound exchange rate against the euro, which was down about 0.65%. This is particularly bad news for Europe, which also has the UK as one of its largest trade partners.

The strength of the euro against the pound comes as the common currency has also been logging some recent highs against the US dollar. Last week, the European Central Bank's Chief Economist, Philip Lane, said the "euro-dollar rate does matter", indicating that policymakers in Europe are worried about the appreciation of the euro.

The remarks came as the common currency neared US$1.2/euro early in the week, a level it has only breached briefly in the past five years. The last time it did so, in early 2018, the European Central Bank (ECB) cut rates further into negative territory and helped to prompt a two-year, nearly 15% drop. To be sure, part of the reason for the euro's fall was the fact that the Federal Reserve was increasing rates in 2018 while the ECB was cutting them.

This time around, the Fed is signaling that its zero-rate policy will be around for a long time, even as inflation expectations rise, making the euro more attractive.

The British pound's exchange rate against the euro has been the most sensitive to Brexit

The added strength of the euro against the pound comes as Europe gives more evidence of pain. Germany's July industrial production numbers released today, for instance, showed a 10% drop year-on-year, much worse than the 7.4% economists had forecast. Meanwhile, the euro-area inflation turned negative in August, the first event of deflation for the region since 2016.

With the political landscape increasingly muddled and the rising probability of a no-deal Brexit pushing the pound lower, the onus is now on the ECB. Policymakers understand the impact of a stronger euro on EU inflation and growth. Whether they will choose to act in their meeting this week, or just keep trying to talk the currency down is the big question now.
